THEORY OF THE EARTH

CHAPTER I
OF THE ORIGIN OF THE EARTH
AND THE FIRST STATE OF THE UNIVERSE
SECTION I
The Earth is supposed to have been created out of nothing, and to have been in a state of confusion for a long time before it was formed into its present shape. The first state of the Earth was a mass of fire and air, which was divided into four parts, the four quarters of the world. The first part was the East, the second the West, the third the North, and the fourth the South. The East was the most fertile, and the West the most barren. The North was the most cold, and the South the most hot. The four quarters of the world were separated by four rivers, the Nile, the Tigris, the Euphrates, and the Danube. The Nile was the most fertile, and the Danube the most barren. The North was the most cold, and the South the most hot. The four quarters of the world were separated by four rivers, the Nile, the Tigris, the Euphrates, and the Danube.

(This was a very old and very true story.)
